It is said that one should not seek to be a tourist, but a traveler. A tourist hits all the most talked about spots; a traveler takes their time to get to know the culture and lifestyle of a place. Without a doubt, Nelson's work reveals him to be a traveler. He lets viewers see the iconic monuments, but juxtaposes these with moments unseen by the tourist. A man drinking a glass of wine, a couple of old row boats tied together, a child riding his bicycle; all mundane events become sacred through Nelson's calculated perspective and use of light. While the trails he visits are walked by many, Nelson cherishes the small, quiet moments that reveal the heart of a destination.
